

Eli Lilly gets stuck in at a local nature reserve

The Learning and Development Team from Eli Lilly's UK headquarters in Basingstoke spent a day away from their desks on 30 July to help benefit an important local Site of Special Scientific Interest. The team of eight volunteers toiled away in the high temperatures rebuilding pathways around Fleet Pond which had been washed away in recent heavy rains. As a result of their work, access to this beautiful area will be improved for its many visitors.

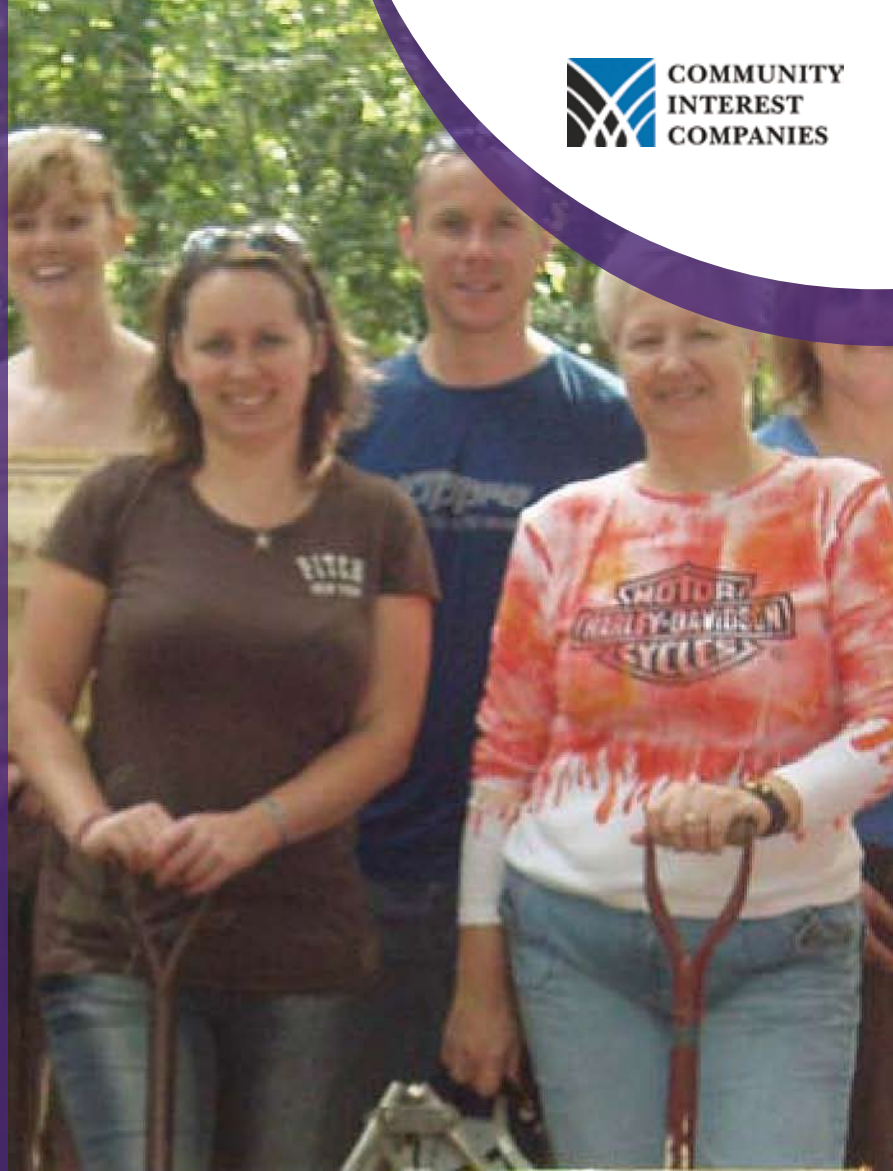

Louise Sibley, Lilly's Learning and Development Manager, says: "We had decided that we wanted to spend a day working together to do something of value in the local community. It was really hard work because it was such a warm day, but very rewarding too – and great fun!"

The event was organised by Employee Volunteering CiC, a community interest company which works to help companies that want to engage more meaningfully with community priorities.
